Andaman and Nicobar Islands Prisons and Correctional Services Regulation, 2026

Reform reflects Government's commitment to a modern India where prisons are not merely places of confinement, but institutions that provide opportunities for positive change

Sri Vijaya Puram, Nov. 19

The Andaman and Nicobar Islands Prisons and Correctional Services Regulation, 2026, under Article 240 of the Constitution of India will replace the Prisons Act, 1894, the Prisoners Act, 1900 and the Transfer of Prisoners Act, 1950, as applicable to the Union Territory of Andaman and Nicobar Islands.

The reform marks a significant shift in the philosophy of prison administration, as it moves beyond a system that was centred primarily on custody, punishment and control, towards one that combines institutional security with dignity, reformation, rehabilitation and social reintegration.

Moving beyond a colonial-era framework

The Prisons Act, 1894 originated in an era when prison administration was principally concerned with confinement, suppression and control. Prisons also formed part of a colonial penal system used to suppress voices and resistance to British rule. Although prison administration has evolved considerably since Independence, the underlying legislative framework remained largely custodial in orientation for more than a century.

The Prisons Act, 1894 did not adequately address contemporary requirements of rehabilitation, mental healthcare, accessibility, gender-sensitive treatment, technology-enabled security and reintegration into society. Its limited emphasis on correctional services represented a missed opportunity to develop prisoners' abilities and skills, enabling them to return as productive citizens and contribute to the nation's human resource potential.

The new Regulation seeks to address these limitations by giving legislative recognition to the constitutional values of equality, human dignity, non-discrimination and the opportunity for reform.

Punishment must not mean the loss of dignity

While imprisonment entails the lawful deprivation of liberty, it should not also deprive an individual of dignity or the opportunity for reform. The new Regulation is guided by the principle that the hardships of incarceration should not be compounded by avoidable indignity, discrimination, inadequate healthcare or the denial of opportunities for personal improvement. It seeks to ensure that prison administration maintains the necessary balance between lawful custody and discipline, on the one hand, and humane treatment, rehabilitation and social reintegration, on the other.

Andaman and Nicobar Islands Prisons and Correctional Services.....

A historic transformation

The reform carries particular historical significance in the Andaman and Nicobar Islands which is home to the Cellular Jail, popularly known as Kala Pani. The historic prison witnessed the incarceration and suffering of numerous freedom fighters during India's struggle for Independence and today stands as a National Memorial.

The fact that this new, reform-oriented prison law should be introduced for these very Islands is deeply symbolic. A territory remembered for the hardships of colonial imprisonment now becomes the setting for a renewed commitment to dignity, humane treatment and the possibility of reform. It reflects the distance travelled by India, from a colonial penal system to a constitutional democracy that recognises both the responsibility of the State to maintain security and public order and the capacity of individuals to reform and contribute to the nation.

Key provisions of the new Regulation

Over the years, several reforms have been introduced in prison administration through rules, administrative measures and judicial interventions. However, these reforms have largely evolved in a piecemeal manner, without a corresponding comprehensive revision of the underlying statutory framework. The proposed Regulation seeks to consolidate these existing reforms, while introducing new safeguards, correctional measures and institutional mechanisms, within a coherent and modern legislative framework. By expressly recognising the rights and entitlements of prisoners and clearly defining the powers, duties and responsibilities of prison authorities, it aims to remove ambiguities, ensure consistency in administration and provide greater legal certainty, transparency and accountability in the functioning of prisons.

The Regulation provides a comprehensive framework covering the following reforms:

- Correctional institutions and individual rehabilitation: Provision for open and semi-open correctional institutions, individual sentence planning, educational opportunities, vocational training and skill development. These measures aim to equip prisoners with skills and opportunities for lawful employment and productive lives after release.
- Risk-based classification and safer custody: Classification and security assessment of prisoners according to security risk, age, health and correctional needs, with separate accommodation and enhanced supervision for high-risk offenders. This will support safer custody, appropriate segregation and individualised correctional treatment.
- Modern technology and stronger prison security: Use of CCTV, biometrics, RFID, digital records, video-conferencing, integration with criminal justice systems and cellular jamming/detection technologies. The Regulation also strengthens measures against organised criminal activities from within prisons and provides specific penalties for unauthorised communication devices and prohibited articles, including imprisonment extending to three years.
- Improved healthcare and mental healthcare: Gender-responsive healthcare and provisions for transfer of prisoners with mental illness to mental health establishments, subject to applicable legal safeguards. Appropriate medical care is recognised as an essential element of humane custody.
- Dignity and protection for women and children: Dedicated safeguards for women prisoners, including maternity care, gender-specific facilities, action on complaints of sexual harassment and healthcare and other facilities for children residing with their mothers until six years of age.
- Inclusive treatment of vulnerable prisoners: Specific provisions for transgender prisoners and prisoners with disabilities, including suitable accommodation, healthcare, psychosocial support, accessible infrastructure, rehabilitation and sensitisation of prison personnel to their needs.
- Prohibition of caste-based discrimination: Express prohibition of caste-based classification, segregation and assignment of prison work, together with practices prohibited under the law relating to manual scavenging. These provisions reinforce the principles of equality, dignity and non-discrimination within correctional institutions.
- Prison leave and reintegration into society: Statutory provisions for parole, furlough, remission and consideration of premature release, subject to eligibility and prescribed conditions. The Regulation also enables after-care services to support needy prisoners in rebuilding their lives and reintegrating into society after release.
- Legal aid and review of undertrial cases: Provision for legal aid in accordance with applicable law and constitution of Under Trial Review Committees in every district, headed by the District and Sessions Judge. These committees will periodically review eligible cases, including those involving prolonged detention, and make recommendations to the concerned courts or authorities.
- Greater transparency, accountability and staff welfare: Departmental inspections, Boards of Visitors headed by judicial officers, reporting of prisoner deaths and grievance redressal mechanisms for prisoners and prison staff. The Regulation also provides for professional training of prison personnel, staff welfare measures, emergency preparedness and institutional development.

The Regulation further facilitates legitimate family contact through supervised physical or virtual communication, provides for access to legal counsel and recognises arrangements for communication by foreign prisoners with their families and consular representatives.

Towards a humane and reformative correctional system

The Regulation is based on the Model Prisons and Correctional Services Act, 2023, circulated by the Ministry of Home Affairs, and incorporates necessary safeguards relating to caste-based discrimination and prisoners with disabilities, which are consistent with the directions of the Hon'ble Supreme Court.

It seeks to establish a correctional system in which security and discipline coexist with fairness, dignity and meaningful opportunities for rehabilitation.

The reform reflects the Government's commitment to a modern India where prisons are not merely places of confinement, but institutions that provide opportunities for positive change and prepare individuals to return to society as responsible and productive citizens. (Source: PIB, Sri Vijaya Puram)
